"The Dow is still very low compared to where it was," Al Pascual, chief market strategist at Ameriprise Financial in Cleveland, told the Financial Times. "You can see from history the stock market does not really take much of a dive until it comes to this [employment situation]." The Dow had been inching upward for several weeks. But shares have fallen more than 3 percent from a Jan. 20 high. The S&P 500 has shed 5.2 percent in the past week. The Federal Reserve is expected to announce on Tuesday that it has expanded the size of its $85 billion program to buy Treasuries and mortgage-backed securities, in an effort to keep interest rates low and spur spending. This week the Labor Department reported that the U.S. economy added 158,000 jobs in January, but companies cut jobs for the eighth consecutive month. The drop in hiring has largely taken place at the small end of the job market, as a growing number of Americans give up looking for work. Investors are focused on an article in the Wall Street Journal on Saturday that said Federal Reserve officials were still worried about the possibility of a double-dip recession. In addition, Microsoft on Friday reported a disappointing quarterly revenue decline, and Intel announced that it will cut another 7,000 jobs. That has led the Dow to retreat from one-month highs. The Dow Jones industrial average has not closed at a greater relative distance from its recent 200-day moving average, which was 11,875 on Friday, since Oct. 19, 2010, according to Dow Jones Market Data. The Nasdaq composite and S&P 500 also have not closed at a greater relative distance from a 200-day moving average, an indicator of whether stocks are in an upward or downward trend, since Jan. 19, a reminder of how investors have been waiting to get their marching orders. "This story is playing a bigger and bigger part of the market," said Tom Simons, chief money market economist at Jefferies & Co. in New York. "It just takes time for all these pieces to fall into place." "I do think the market
