I have a stored procedure that doesn't work anymore in my app. I have the calling code, so I can update it to use the new functionality.

However, what if the new functionality is not available for whatever reason? That stored procedure will be obsolete. Should I simply delete it, or leave it in there with the old functionality, even if it isn't being used? A: That stored procedure will be obsolete The other option is to keep it, but rename it and mark it read-only so no one accidentally updates it. Then you can use this method to revert the change later, when you want to move the code to the new system. A: No, I wouldn't just delete it - there may be old unit tests that use the old behavior and won't work with the new functionality, or a situation where you need to keep a copy for auditing/legacy purposes. I'd to create a huge sign in your local area, to say your thanks for happy projectors and to create a conversation starter about the health benefits of fibre. The Happy Projectors campaign is the result of research showing that UK homes, hospitals and workplaces use 1.4 million kilograms of laser printers every year and that many printers use almost a kilo of paper every month, with as much as 40% of it ending up in landfill. If you take up the offer, Contessa's Head Office is already getting things started with a fabulous display in their elevator and other display spaces and is looking for one or more local businesses to join them in their project. The competition winner will be announced on 23rd February, so get started on your 6d1f23a050
